

Abstract

This study is to develop a simple overlapping generations (OLG) model to rationalize the evidence that population aging could induce structural transformation. In particular, this study introduces the role of preference shift, which claims that once an individual becomes old, he/she shifts his/her preference toward healthcare service. Such a process increases the share of employment in services at the expense of the agriculture and manufacturing sectors.